Solutions: The present invention relates to a method of decoding data encoded with data interleaving. More specifically, the present invention relates to the decoding of data encoded with data interleaving, where coding technology such as convolutional codes or block coding is used. Data processing systems and, in particular, wireless communication systems require communication between various components. The data to be communicated between these components is often encoded, and then modulated to achieve secure and reliable communication. In the wireless communication field, it is well known to use code schemes such as convolutional coding or block coding to encode the data to be transmitted. It is also well known that to be compatible with the channel environment, the data must be modulated prior to encoding. For example, the encoding technology should not use too sophisticated a modulation technology such as 64QAM or other such schemes. Such sophisticated modulation schemes require long bit sequences and cause the amount of data to be transmitted to quickly saturate the communication channel. Data modulation, such as 64QAM, is often used in combination with convolutional coding
