My main question is What is the difference between Library and ActiveX control? If you know the answer please reply. I would like to know for the future. A: What is the difference between Library and ActiveX control? A library is typically a file (I call it one word) that you reference in your code to use the functionality of your code. An ActiveX control is (or is a) chunk of software that has functionality (hopefully) provided by a vendor. Examples are things like ActiveX controls in web browsers that extend the functionality of browsers to show advertising, or ActiveX controls to facilitate some DLL or COM communication (such as the ActiveX DataObjects). I would consider ActiveX to be a different class of object than a library. Example, I have a library called myLib.dll. This library has a function that counts. It is not a chunk of software - it's code compiled into a DLL. However, I can reference it in Visual Studio and then use a function from that library in my code. Another example is that I could write some code that reads and writes a database - those are chunks of software. However, those chunks of software can be distributed in the form of a.dll or.exe that includes more or less code than the basic functionality necessary
