But for some, the world-changing effect of this "lifestyle" option is purely psychological, even if it's good for the planet. Since 2007, "work from home" has been a buzzword for businesses. For some, the idea of commuting to work is an antiquated idea. And for others, it's a way to spend more time with their children, or spend more time with their spouse. But that doesn't mean it can't be good for both sides of the office equation. A new survey from CareerBuilder finds that 20% of employed adults now work from home at least one day a week, with only 25% of those employees saying they regularly work from home full-time. Employers are obviously keen on this "lifestyle" option, as 59% of them said they would give telecommuters a better job offer because of their flexibility. In this economy, telecommuting has gotten easier for both the employee and employer. Technology has helped many employees make the transition to telecommuting, even if they didn't quite realize it. Remember all those apps like Google Wave that are now disappearing? Some of them – like Google Wave – were about allowing users to collaborate by creating documents and editing them from a desktop app or website. With those programs, each person could send his own edits in real-time to the document, then save his own version and send it to others. These programs were a good idea for people working in a small group like a team or even a family. But they were clumsy, especially for the corporate environment. And the whole idea of people working together on a document in real time was awkward at best. Google Wave, for example, allows you to view a message with all your friends. But you can't send them anything. That's exactly what the Skype for Business
