The film has an image-receptive layer which is sensitive to the image-forming radiation of a given color (e.g., black, cyan, magenta, and yellow). This image-receptive layer is for use in the printing of color photographs and is receptive to the image-forming radiation of a corresponding color. The image-receptive layer is also capable of photo-decomposing a color-forming compound so that, upon an exposure of the image-receptive layer to the image-forming radiation and development of the same with an aqueous alkali, a color complementary to the color of the image-forming radiation is formed. Color photographic prints, which are made for reproduction purposes only, are known. In the production of these prints, a colored-image negative is made by photographing images of the various colors (e.g., black, cyan, magenta, and yellow) superimposed on the same film base, and the color-separated negatives are then printed in sequence on a white base material. Alternatively, the negatives may be printed in sequence on the same white base material, each color being printed in sequence on an appropriate image-receptive layer of the same film base, thereby producing a color photographic print. The appropriate image-receptive layers are usually sensitive to the image-forming radiation of one color, and the image-forming radiation of that color is exposed directly to the image-receptive layer of the same film base. In such a case, upon development of the negative with an aqueous alkali, the corresponding color is formed on the base material. If a reproduction-ready film is to be made, i.e., if a silver halide film should be used, the objective is to provide a photographic print having the same color tone as that of the negative. For example, black color is recorded by a layer in which silver halide grains are capable of image-forming (in a self-developing system) or 82138339de
