Q: The Palindromic Number. I am trying to find the latest palindromic number of 100,000 digits. Consider a 17 digit number $abcde\bar{f}ghij$. We will write it as 100,000. Now consider all the substring formed by 4 consecutive elements. If any of those substrings is a palindrome, we say that the complete 100,000 digits string is a palindrome. How many palindromes of 100,000 digits can we construct? A: I've found an explanation at A positive integer N is called a palindrome if it can be written in its reduced form as $N = r_1 r_2 \dots r_n = s_1 s_2 \dots s_n$ where the r_i are nonempty and, for $1 \leq i \leq n$, either $r_i = r_{i+1}$ or $s_i = s_{i+1}$. The r_i are called the radicals of N , and the s_i are called the signs of N . If N is palindromic, then N has exactly $\frac{1}{2}n(n+1)$ radicals and, in particular, N has at least as many as n distinct radicals. To count palindromes, we construct a bijection from the set of palindromes to the set of all palindromes with $n = \frac{1}{2}n(n+1)$ by mapping a palindrome $a_1 a_2 \dots a_n$ to the palindrome $a_2 a_1 a_2 a_3 a_4 \dots a_n$, where we fill each palindromic period with the same sign (e.g. we have $a_2 a_1 a_2 a_3 a_4 \dots a_n = s_1 s_2 \dots s_n = a_2 a_1 a_2 a_3 \dots a_n$). The inverse of this bijection maps a palindrome $a_1 a_2$

AMSTERDAM (Reuters) - From this week, popular Dutch websites will be tested for cyber attacks by an independent organization to see whether they are good enough to be published by Google's major portal, Google.nl. FILE PHOTO: A Google logo is pictured in Los Angeles, California, United States, April 19, 2016. REUTERS/Lucy Nicholson/File Photo Google, or at least its Dutch-language portal, will not take responsibility for sites that are not good enough, "for lack of security," said Bram van den Berg, senior security adviser at the Cyber Security Centre (CYBAS), which will carry out the tests. Such sites would otherwise be censored or taken down by Google or its own web filters, "because they don't do enough to protect themselves," van den Berg said. The tests will involve examining whether a website is sufficiently protected against cyber attacks. That will not include websites that remain within the Google network but are published on other platforms, such as social media sites or shop websites. Cyber attacks now pose a significant threat to internet security, especially due to the rapid spread of mobile devices and social media networks. Google is stepping up its security measures following a string of high-profile attacks, including one by state-sponsored hackers that hijacked adverts in the world's top-selling video site and the theft of 1 billion user credentials from its developer platform. The company's search engine is vulnerable to digital attacks, and hackers were able to breach its network and use it to manipulate online searches. The security centre will build a database of websites and companies that fail to comply with the minimum security requirements for publishing content on Google's platform. Google's Dutch operations will be covered by the initial tests. According to van den Berg, Google is currently checking that all its more than 10,000 websites meet the minimum security requirements for publishing on Google.nl. After the initial test period, Google will decide how to act on the list of websites that should not be published on its Dutch portal. Google declined to comment when contacted by Reuters.
