Powered by the OpenJDK project. between the nature of the offense and the potential punishment, whether the defendant was aware of the potential punishment, and the circumstances. Id. -6- No. 16-5622 United States v. Chaney “reasonably calculated to affect the defendant’s willingness to plead guilty, or the court’s decision regarding the application of an acceptance-of-responsibility adjustment.” Bennett, 291 F.3d at 953. Merely hypothesizing that information about the investigation, such as its scope, may have an impact on the sentencing process does not establish the existence of a reasonable probability of a different outcome. See Hayes, 171 F.3d at 398. In fact, the information about the investigation would not even have been available to the defendants at the time they entered their pleas. The district court thus did not err in concluding that the defendants failed to establish a reasonable probability that had they been informed that the investigation would reveal a high-level within the organization, the district court would have sentenced them differently.
