- Open Source software created by me. - Design purpose: to create a set of icon replacements, with each icon in the set having a different category/function. The icons are clean and they cover most of the requirements: - Symbolic icons. - Various sizes. - The new icon format and path is a small file: 16.2KB per icon, excluding the icon background. Requirements: - The folder icons

should work fine in the "dock" configuration. If you don't know what is the dock, you can have a look at the dock definitions in my.ico file. - The icons should be small enough to look good in the dock. I've done my best to provide good quality icons, but of course, there are limitations in the graphic software used. So, feel free to tell me about it. Additions

- You can replace the folders with the folder-like app icons with the style they have in the original apps. - You can use the app-like folders with the style they have in the original apps, or you can use them with the style of the app-like icons. ---

And I define a function which takes the struct by reference as follows: `void bar(struct foo &d) { d.x++; d.y++; }` And then call it like: `int main() { struct foo a; a.x = 0; a.y = 0; bar(a); printf("%d ", a.x); printf("%d ", a.y); return 0; }` I wanted to know whether the behaviour is defined, or it depends on the compiler? A: This program is well defined, in both C and C++. The result is undefined in C++. In C++, there is an implicit conversion from `foo&` to `const foo&` (and `bar` is not `1d6a3396d6`)
