The U.S. Army plans to spend $16 billion on weapons and vehicles in the next five years, a 30 percent increase over the last five years.

"But this is not only about procurement, it's also about logistics," Army Materiel Command Chief Warrant Officer 2 Nathan Letticola said. "It's about moving things to warfighting units. It's also about getting assets to Afghanistan." The Defense Department's fiscal 2018 budget request will be released on March 15. The budget plan will include funding for programs and the Army's budget request. Letticola said the budget request will be used to guide decisions on investments.

Advertisement "We look at what the budget is giving us and use that to help us drive investments," Letticola said. "I would also say this is just the beginning of a budget cycle. We're going to continue to work through the budget process and move forward from there." A Senate report released in February said the Army estimated it would need $17.6 billion worth of new weapons systems in five years, and that it needed more of those weapons systems than it did the previous five years. "The Army is in the process of a mid-course correction that is not only required, but given the state of our economy and government, we are currently achieving. We are now able to do more with less," Letticola said. "It's a principle that is always out there and always will be there, but it is a reality that we are taking action to remediate." That means the Army is placing an emphasis on the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, tank modernization programs, and logistics. The Army plans to invest $8.7 billion in new systems, but it also is planning to use the budget to reinvest in maintenance programs, Letticola said. "We will do things to keep our systems ready," Letticola said. "We'll do things to make sure that we're supporting and sustaining them. This
