Estimating the prognosis of acute cholecystitis with the score to assess diagnostic accuracy of the acute cholecystitis (SADAG) index: a retrospective analysis. The SADAG index has been developed to evaluate the probability of gallbladder (GB) calculi in acute cholecystitis (AC). The objective of this study was to determine whether it is possible to provide an indication of the prognosis of patients with AC based on the results of the SADAG index at the time of hospital admission. This study was a retrospective analysis. The study included 176 patients with AC and gallbladder stones in the Emergency Department of a second-level hospital. Patients were graded according to the severity of AC using the SADAG index. All patients were followed up to determine the need for surgical treatment and the days of hospitalization. The mean follow-up time was 35 days (range 3-66 days). Patients with a SADAG index of less than 2.9 had a 0% incidence of need for surgery and were discharged within 1 day of admission, but 25.8% developed pain or nausea during follow-up. Patients with a SADAG index of more than 3.5 had a 96.6% need for surgical treatment and an average hospital stay of 14 days. In patients with a SADAG index of 2.9-3.5, hospitalization duration of 12 days or less was the best discrimination point for the outcome of hospitalization. The SADAG index was highly predictive of outcome and could be useful to identify patients needing surgery.Q: Checking the service availability of process I have the following code snippet where I need to check the availability of the service with a given name.
