Whim, Intentionality, Vulnerability, and Perception of the Self in Schizophrenia. In research into how the self is perceived in schizophrenia, Whim, Intentionality, Vulnerability, and Perception of the Self (WIVPoSS) have been termed 'core', or 'central', and 'compromised' features of reality testing. Within the WIVPoSS framework, in a large epidemiological sample, 362 individuals with schizophrenia or related disorders rated the extent to which they experienced each of the four domains of reality testing in different situations: 72.3% of participants rated one or more domains as compromised. Within each domain, three factors were identified: Crude Raw Perception of Self (Cp), Intentionality (Ip), and Vulnerability (Vp). The factors showed moderate correlation within each dimension. The broad interpretation of reality testing referred to here does not directly address the concept of schizophrenia or its phenomenology. However, a subsequent data-reduction study of the four domains of reality testing in a subsample of individuals with schizophrenia and other disorders showed reduced Cronbach's alpha, and showed that some of the correlated variables were unrelated. These observations are discussed with reference to the broader, and more implicit, concept of 'ambiguity' of the self in schizophrenia.
