I'm installing a 400W universal power strip. I want to use it to power a 4K TV, a wireless printer, and a small fan. The TV, fan, and printer are all on the same switch. The switch's connected to a modem. I want to connect the 4K TV and the fan to a LAN port of the modem. Is it possible to unify the switch and the modem and connect the 4K TV, the fan, and the switch to the modem? If so, how? A: From what I understand you have three separate devices each needing 4 wires. Yes, that is entirely possible. The power switch will connect to the network switch as well as the network ports of the modem. Then your network switch will have a 4-port LAN port. Connect it to the four ports of the power strip. Connect a network port of the network switch to the modem's ethernet port. Connect the ethernet port of the power switch to the LAN port of the network switch. Connect the modem to the wall outlet. Usually the power switch is "smart enough" to indicate power is present, and will automatically turn off or on devices that are not connected. The present invention relates generally to a pallet for securely holding and carrying a product and, more particularly, to a pallet which is readily portable and which is constructed for high loads. Pallets have long been used for transporting and supporting goods and materials. In more recent years, however, customarily used shipping pallets have proven to be a source of construction difficulty and danger. Conventionally, shipping pallets consist of wooden slats covered by a layer of plastic or similar material to protect the slats from damage by contact with the material being transported. However,

Combination of treatment with high-dose steroid and conventional nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs) is a widely accepted treatment modality for controlling the disease activity in children with rheumatoid arthritis (RA). Toxicity, however, is one of the major problems that must be considered when treating a child with RA, particularly with chronic NSAID administration. We present a case report of the treatment of a 4-year-old girl with juvenile RA who developed lumbosacral injury due to the prolonged administration of corticosteroid and cyclooxygenase (COX)-2 inhibitor because of the uncontrolled disease activity. The effectiveness of decreasing inflammatory activity by changing the medication to a COX-2 inhibitor was observed and maintained.Body mass index and risk of hip fractures: the Rotterdam Study. Previous studies on the association of body mass index (BMI) with the risk of hip fractures have shown conflicting results. We examined the association between BMI and the risk of hip fracture using data from the prospective population-based Rotterdam Study. Subjects included 2401 women and 863 men with no history of hip fractures (n = 3032) who were interviewed between 1990 and 1999 and who had a measured BMI in 1991-1994. We compared the incidence of incident hip fractures in the period of 1999-2007 among subjects with a BMI in the lowest and the highest quartile. We used Cox regression models to calculate hazard ratios (HRs) with 95% confidence intervals (CIs) adjusting for possible confounders. During the follow-up, 265 women and 84 men developed a hip fracture. The age-adjusted incidence rate of hip fractures was significantly lower in those with a BMI in the highest quartile compared to those in the lowest (HR 0.78, 95% CI 0.59-1.04). The HRs for those in the highest quartile of BMI compared to those in the lowest adjusted for age (Model I), smoking, alcohol, years of education, place of birth, and all other confounders
