Q: Difference between location to display link - iframe, or direct link to the file? I am just trying to get to grips with the differences between the 2. How and why does the link need to be displayed, or rather where in the browser does it need to be displayed? And where can it be displayed? The iframe or direct linking? Thanks. EDIT - My apologies, I should have given a more specific example to follow what I was asking. As it stands I would be glad of a link to a full example. I have a webserver that hosts videos in numerous formats - mp4, gif, flv etc. Each of these are hosted at the same webserver by the same uploader. They are all in the same directory and the uploader stores them in a format that recognises what format the video is. As a result I have to manually load up the various videos and try and work out what format the video is in. With Flash - you can do this very easily, so I can display flash videos on a page as well as other videos. I am happy to do this, but I wish to make a generic file browser that can load any video from a folder with a link. All the information I have found online has

lead me to this - but I am
